The Umbrella That Knew Too Much

It was an ordinary Monday when Ravi found the umbrella. Black, tattered, and lying abandoned at the bus stop. Rain poured heavily, and he picked it up without thinking. But the moment he opened it, whispers filled the air. Not from people—but from the umbrella.

"Don't go to work," it murmured.

Ravi blinked. "What?"

The umbrella insisted, repeating the warning louder. Curious and unnerved, Ravi obeyed. Moments later, a news alert pinged on his phone—a gas leak had caused an explosion at his office building.

Grateful but confused, Ravi kept the umbrella close. Over the week, it guided him, warning him of everything from spilled coffee to a stray dog bite. He trusted it. Until Sunday, when it whispered, "Run."

"From what?" he asked.

The umbrella creaked.

"From me," it hissed.

Then it snapped open by itself—and the world turned black.

Forever.
